The Security Council as Global Legislator

Cover Image Source: Routledge, 2014

The Security Council's decisions are legally binding on all UN member-states, effectively complementing obligations under the conventional international law, agreed in treaties or customs between states. The Security Council therefore acts as a global 'legislator', in addition to a global 'policeman' (two roles clearly separated in domestic constitutionalism). There have been quantitative and qualitative shifts in the Council's activity since the end of the Cold War: historically the Council addressed specific country situations, defining threats to the peace and adopting measures to mitigate or, ideally, eliminate these threats; more recently the Council, in parallel with country-specific situations, started discussions on issues of global concerns - terrorism, weapons of mass destruction, children in armed conflict, protection of civilians, piracy, climate change - and adopted thematic resolutions addressing global threats. To what extent do the thematic resolutions represent a legislative standard-setting contribution? Are the thematic resolutions useful for the maintenance of international peace and security? This book demonstrates how the Council can create an entirely new 'hard' law (non-proliferation of weapons of mass destruction and non-state actors; jurisdiction of international criminal tribunals), but also how the Council can address a variety of 'soft' security issues and build up important 'soft' power in the international constitutional system.

The UNU Library hosts the launch of the book "Security Council as Global Legislator", edited by Vesselin Popovski and Trudy Fraser (Routledge, 2014).
