The online seminar was held on purpose to understand further the UN’s intervention in Kosovo and the atrocities that Kosovan people had witnessed during the war period 1998-1999. The UN’s role in Kosovo peacebuilding process was one of the key topics discussed because its role has been emphasized as insufficient in the reconciliation between Kosovo and its former occupier Serbia. Additionally, it was examined the role of the International Criminal Justice Court (ICJ) and the Advisory Opinions and Orders in Accordance with the International Law of the Unilateral Declaration of Independence regarding Kosovo Advisory Opinion (July 22, 2010).
Following Ms. Sopaj’s introduction, the Ambassador of Kosovo to Japan, Mr. Leon Malazogu started his presentation by giving a concise historical background of the conflict that took place in Kosovo from 1998 to 1999. He further revealed the obstacles that Kosovo citizens encountered during the breakup of Yugoslavia, and the time when Kosovo sought autonomy. He explained that Kosovo as an independent state welcomes foreign countries to invest in it due to its remarkable progress. He further showed that the UN’s role back then as the major actor that was not mandated clearly for the nation-building.
He clarified the complexities that the UN confronted that took eighteen months attempting to acknowledge which law to rehearse in Kosovo. With respect to the UN command in Kosovo, Malazogu tells that the UN has not done as much as it was expected and said and that it is astonishing that Kosovo is frequently bantered in the UNSC meeting than any other countries who has gone through similar historical event. Until today, Serbia has not recognized Kosovo’s independence, which is deficient regarding the advancement that the two countries could achieve in the regional and international level.

He gives the determination for a beneficial standpoint for the two countries if Serbia recognizes Kosovo independence by giving a green light to start membership negotiations with the European Union and the UN. Being Ambassador of Kosovo to Japan; he gave his view that Japan has been ceaselessly steady partner to Kosovo, and he enunciated the common interest of Japan and Kosovo in liberal order.

The first analyst, Mr. Ken Inoue, Vice President of Global Peacebuilding Association Japan (GPAJ), outlined his position when he was assigned as Municipal Administrator of UNMIK in Skenderaj and the intricated stage that Kosovo went through. He stated that during that time the UN had a strong impact on Kosovo’s tested occasions. He pointed out three areas that the UN was focused at that time: humanitarian assistance, reconciliation between Kosovo Serbia, and the third is the establishment of basic administrations.

His query addressed to the Ambassador was regarding the land swap of Kosovo territory. How important is Kosovo taking this matter and whether it can solve Kosovo problems?

The subsequent analyst, Mr. Motoo Noguchi, who was Japanese Ambassador for International Judicial Cooperation at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of Japan seconded from the Supreme Public Prosecutors Office/Ministry of Justice (2018-2020) proceeded with the discussions by beginning to share his perspective on the Kosovo case from the context of law and justice. He begins from Kosovo’s revelation of freedom and the decision of International Criminal Justice Court (ICJ). At the point when the declaration of Kosovo independence was released, he was affiliated with the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of Japan, International Legal Affairs Bureau in charge of state recognition. From his own view comparison to his mission in Cambodia, the most critical component in pursuing justice is how the entire effort is supported by the local community.

The third analyst Mr. Saturo Kurosawa visited Kosovo for the first time in August 1999 when the United Nations Mission in Kosovo (UNMIK) was established. He visited Kosovo in the excess of multiple times from 2009 to 2012 when he was in charge of ODA of Japan International Cooperation Agency (JICA) in the Balkans. Talking about the role of the UN, Kurosawa shows that the UN has contributed to Kosovo to a great degree via the UNMIK. However, the decree of UNMIK has been lowered as the power was handed over to the Kosovo government and the EU. Further, he said that the Kosovo Force (KFOR) was in charge of the security of Kosovo. He addressed two questions to Ambassador Malazogu. First, what roles do you anticipate the UN to play for the dialogue of Kosovo with Serbia, and can the UN facilitate the dialogue between these two countries? The second question is how the UN can moderate the membership of Kosovo in international organizations?
Ambassador Abazi began by remarking more on the KFOR and UNMIK role on the cohesion of Kosovo at the regional level. Being one of the people opposing the Serbian regime during that time, Ambassador Abazi disclosed to us further about his immediate commitment to the nation-building of Kosovo until the declaration of Kosovo independence. KFOR from the beginning showed progress in Kosovo being under the NATO observation by assuring Kosovo as a safe and amicable country. Unfortunately, UNMIK did not play a significant role in contrast to NATO. To clarify better, he divided the UNMIK’s activity into two sections. The UNMIK’s role in civil administration was significant on progressing but the current UNMIK’s role in Kosovo is not doing much with regard to progress being settled on the north of Kosovo were the majority of Serbs lives. If Kosovo is to be taken as a case for the other countries in the nation’s building and the UN’s organization's role, there is a lot to learn of how certain roles of the organization could have changed the course.

Ambassador Qendrim Gashi continued with one aspect of the UN approach that has not been understood correctly, but which has a long-term impact: the territorial approach. When the UN was settled in Kosovo, all endeavors to have reconciliation were made within the territory of Kosovo, ignoring the fact that the war in Kosovo was not a conflict between two ethnic communities in Kosovo but rather between Kosovo and Serbia. Normally, the war gravely affected the relations between ethnic communities in Kosovo. The UN approach in the Balkans to a great extent disregarded the fact that there was no Kosovo problem but a Serbia problem in the Balkans. Undoubtedly, it was Serbia that waged wars against Slovenia, Croatia, Bosnia, and finally against Kosovo. Kosovo has advocated for reconciliation, attempting to conquer its recent tragic past. Kosovo has demonstrated continually its willingness to settle outstanding issues and accepted reasonable compromises, as was the case during the war in Kosovo (Rambouillet accords) and during the Vienna talks (Ahtisaari package).

Ms. Merdiana Leci concurred with Ambassador Malazogu's presentation that UNMIK was initially welcomed in Kosovo. But, without a clear mandate, it was viewed as a hindrance on the way to the final status. The lack of local input and accountability to the mission raised questions about how much is the mission helping in state-building and making way for independence. So, there are lessons to be learn from many UN peacekeeping missions. There is a demand for a better balance between international responsibility and local ownership. For instance, one of the ways UN missions can increase their credibility where they operate is by incorporating local staff and input in decision-making. However, all UN agencies working in Kosovo are highly appreciated and the people of Kosovo are grateful for the humanitarian work and assistance they continue to provide in several projects around the country even today.

Dr. Dahlia Simangan's interest in Kosovo presented a unique perspective to the seminar as she witnessed the transformation of the development that Kosovo went through. She affirms that to understand the complications that Kosovar people have gone through its necessary to talk to people who lives there since the war ended. She addressed a question to the Ambassador Malazogu: What are the challenges and prospects for nation-building given the significant number of Kosova diaspora?

Dr. Sukehiro Hasegawa addressed a question about the position of Japan during the initial stage of the Kosovo resolution. He explained that each UN mission is unique depending on the conflict situation taking place in a specific region. The expectations of Kosovan people from the UN seemed more than the organization could convey. Further, Dr. Hasegawa explained that the advisory opinion of ICJ came as a result of Serbia's request that has provided Kosovo with the legitimacy of its independence. His concluding remarks were that the only way to overcome these problems is when two parties cooperate together in order to make their case in the international community better than Timor-Leste and Indonesia did, which enabled the entry of Timor-Leste to the United Nations.
The contribution of this seminar was the discussion of various perspectives of the UN intervention in Kosovo in 1999 and other countries such as; Timor Leste, Rwanda, Cambodia etc., and what could have been done differently to have changed the course of the event. Having Kosovo people present in this seminar and diverse practitioners and experts in the humanitarian field that have been either engaged directly or indirectly in the Kosovo nation-building made an efficient seminar simultaneously a delicate discussion between the participants.

Other speakers who made relevant questions were:

1. Gamarra: In what Kosovo has fizzled to get more consideration from the international community?
2. Kubota: What is the challenge of nation-building from the fragmentation of national-identity in Kosovo (if it exists)?
3. Kumagai: In terms of reconciliation, is there any solid issue to be taken between Kosovo and Serbia?
4. Ishizuka: Why the peacekeeping mission in Kosovo hasn’t been successful as it was expected?
5. Kihara-Hunt: As Kosovo had lots of actors involved in its nation-building, how can this experience be exported to UN or peace operation or peacebuilding activities (what can we learn from it)?
